1 以下の英文を読んで、次の問いに答えなさい。

Planning a wedding is a stressful process. There's the venue selection, the menu planning, decor*, date, etc. But one of the most difficult decisions can be <sup>(1)</sup> (guest list / include / on / the / to / who). Who receives an invitation and who doesn't will depend ( <sup>(2)</sup> ) many factors, but when it comes to adding co-workers to the 5 guest list, the choice can be even more complicated.

When adding co-workers to your guest list, consider first whether you are truly friends. "If there are co-workers who you socialize ( <sup>(3)</sup> ) outside of the office, they should be invited," says etiquette* consultant Jodi Smith, president and owner of Mannersmith Etiquette Consulting.

10 If there is a group of co-workers that you go out to dinner with, spend time on weekends with or play on recreational teams with, <sup>(4)</sup> those co-workers can be considered actual friends and should be treated the same as your non-work friends when it comes to getting an invite.

When inviting co-workers, Smith refers to <sup>(5)</sup> the rule of half. "If you are inviting 15 close to half of the work group — or half of those in a small office — you should be inviting everyone," she says. If you're inviting less than a third of the work group and are excluding more co-workers than you are inviting, then you don't need to extend an invitation to everyone.

20 There is no rule that you have to invite your boss to your wedding. Smith says your boss should be treated in the same way as any other co-worker. If you are friends outside the office, or if you are inviting half of the office or work group, your boss should be on the invite list.

Remember, your wedding is a special day that you will remember ( <sup>(6)</sup> ) years to come. "25 years from now, long after you have left this job, your childhood 25 friends will still be your childhood friends, your cousins will still be your cousins, but will you still be ( <sup>(7)</sup> ) touch with your co-workers from a quarter of a century ago?" asks Smith. <sup>(8)</sup> When making your guest list, think about the faces you want to see in your wedding album when you're celebrating your anniversary years from now.
