(A)[全訳]〈大阪大〉

We live in a world densely populated by humans in close communication with one another over the surface of the earth. More and more, the world looks like a single society, a “global village.” But in fact, human society consists of a great many groups, as different from one another as the city dwellers of New York, rice farmers of India, and aboriginal hunters of northern Canada. People differ not only in their daily occupations and material wealth, but also in the ways in which they view the world around them. This multitude of perceptions is directly related to cultural diversity around the world, a diversity that is rapidly shrinking.

The Nature of Excellent Teaching

What distinguishes great teachers from merely competent ones is not so much the knowledge they possess as the judgment with which they respond to students, noticing confusion before it is expressed, changing an explanation when necessary, and asking questions that encourage students to think for themselves. Rarely do we realize that, by attributing their success to some mysterious gift that cannot be analyzed or acquired, we may be turning what could serve as a valuable lesson, carefully examined and gradually applied by others, into something that is merely admired from a distance. It is only when we examine such teachers closely that the true complexity of teaching becomes apparent.
